My Experience during Operation Rising Warhawk

By Alexis Benitez

Being the Operation Rising Warhawk (ORW) Cadet Wing Commander was both a daunting yet memorable experience. The ORW Cadet Staff and I prepared well during the days that lead up to ORW. However, as the Cadet Wing Commander, I felt that my expectations the day of ORW was not what I had imagined. Because of the responsibility I held, my emotions got the best of me and as a result, I became fixated on trying to solve every problem on my own. I realized later that should not have been the case.

What I learned from this experience is that confidence and trust work hand in hand with one another when it comes to leading. In order to have the confidence to lead, you need to trust in your own abilities and trust that those around you will assist you when necessary.

Additionally, the relationships that you build with those around you will further strengthen the camaraderie amongst the group.

It is experiences like these that helped me grow as a person. Although ORW did not run as smoothly as the ORW Cadet Staff and I had planned, the constructive criticism that we received will help us become better followers and leaders for the future.
